When To Consider Hospice

Consider hospice care when your loved one is facing a life-limiting illness and:

- Medical Treatment is No Longer Effective: Treatments that focus on curing the illness have become ineffective, and the focus has shifted to comfort care.
- Declining Physical Health: Significant weight loss, difficulty eating or swallowing, increasing fatigue, and declining mobility are signs that the body is no longer able to sustain itself.
- Frequent Hospital Visits: If your loved one is often hospitalized for symptoms related to their illness, hospice care may provide a more stable, comfortable environment at home.
- Increased Need for Pain and Symptom Management: Persistent pain, nausea, difficulty breathing, and other symptoms that can no longer be easily managed with conventional treatments are common indicators for hospice.
- Decline in Cognitive Function: Significant confusion, difficulty communicating, and memory loss may signal a shift toward end-of-life care.
